

Difference Between Criminal Case And Civil Cases

Shaun Camelo

A criminal case is simply a form of court proceedings where the defendant is charged with criminal conduct, either for the commission of an unlawful act, or illegal behavior as defined by the state or constitution, or federal statutes. Generally most criminal cases begin with a formal arrest and arraignment, both conducted by a judge, and then later, after the defendant has been formally released, at a later court date known as an arraignment. After the arraignment the defendant may be ordered by the judge to take a preliminary appearance, where they are required to confirm their recognizance of all charges against them. The initial appearance is taken care of by the clerk of courts. Once all three elements of a criminal trial have been met, the jury will be selected and then the case will proceed.

A criminal case differs from a civil case, in that there is a specific time limit within which the person accused of crimes must face trial. Within certain limited circumstances, a criminal charge may be resolved without even appearing at all. These conditions vary by state and jurisdiction. However, it is not uncommon for cases to go to trial even when a defendant does not admit guilt, or it is not possible for the defense to prove the nature of the charges against them.

It is important to understand that the role of a defense lawyer in a criminal court case is to advise the judge on the legal charges against the defendant, as well as any alternate resolutions which may be applicable. A defendant's lawyer must be able to explain the criminal charges against him, and present any mitigating circumstances which may exist, in order to avoid a conviction. The criminal lawyer will argue on behalf of his client's innocence and explain why he should not be convicted of the crime in question. Most criminal lawyers work independently of the state prosecutor, and some will even work on a contingency fee basis, meaning that they receive no fees if their client is not convicted. However, it should be kept in mind that if a conviction occurs, the lawyer may lose their fees.

In contrast, civil cases are governed by state law and are usually settled out of court. Because of this, the process is much slower than a criminal case, as discovery plays a larger role in determining the scope of the case. Discovery is the process of looking into and gathering information about the subject of a lawsuit. In a civil case, discovery is particularly important because the legal system looks to qualified legal professionals such as witnesses, experts, and private investigators. It is not uncommon for hundreds of thousands of dollars to be spent investigating whether or not a defendant may have committed a crime.

Unlike a criminal case, a civil case does not have an attorney who defends the accused solely on his/her behalf. Instead, civil lawyers work on behalf of their clients, trying to provide evidence in support of their client's position in court. Civil rights attorneys deal with cases involving employment discrimination, landlord tenant issues, and other landlord-related crimes. They also handle issues such as divorce, child custody, and juvenile crimes. Because these cases involve a complex issue that deals with broad concepts of fairness, the legal system often favors litigants seeking damages or an end to alleged discrimination.

Unlike a criminal case, a civil case is not tried before a jury. Instead, a number of individuals with various opinions are selected to determine the guilt or innocence of a defendant. Unlike in a criminal case, defendants do not have the opportunity to argue their case to a jury. As such, it can take several months before a case is heard and ruled on. In many instances, defendants are represented by their own attorney, meaning that they are not represented by a public defender who would be paid by the state for his/her services.

In criminal cases, one aspect that can lead to more severe consequences than in civil cases is double jeopardy. This refers to a situation where a defendant who has been accused of a crime, but has also been accused of committing another crime of a lower degree, could be tried for two different offenses. A common example of this is someone who has been accused of murder but has also been accused of arson. In these cases, the punishment could be death by hanging or execution. Even if the accused does not die in a criminal trial, he may still be subjected to parole after serving part of his/her sentence.

One of the biggest differences between a criminal case and a civil case is the amount of damage that can be ordered by a judge or jury. In civil cases, the damage that can be awarded to a victim or his/her family is usually limited to the amount of damage that a person actually damages rather than what the jury or judge decides. For example, in a civil case involving intentional wrongs against a person, damages awarded may include medical costs for the victims and their families, mental pain and suffering, and punitive damages (for example, wages lost and past wages while the person was being sued).
